PHILIPPA GIVES A PARTY.

FURTHER STEPS BY ONE WHO WOULD BE IN LITERATURE.

The Catastrophe That Threatenedito Buin Her Prosperts at the Start-Adele's Self-enerifies and Her Attempt to Make the Punishment Fit a Contemplated Crime. Philippa gave a party the other night. Of course, Frances and Adele and I were in it, too; but Philippa promulgated it, as she said. "Perpetrated it, you mean," said Frances, upon whom, as housekeeper, Philippa's au-nouncement fell with peculiar and crushing algorificance. "I can't help it," said Philippa. "You girls drave me to literature, and now you must take the consequences, be they whatsoever they

"It's the whomsoever that I'm worried about," murmured Frances, for Philippa had already announced her list. There were to be only half a dozen guests; that would make ten of us all together. No one but Philippa would have called it a party, but she has a fondness for the word. She says that it dates from the time when she used to set her small table with her doil dishes and feast herself and the neighbors' children on cambric tea and cookies. Philippa says she pleaded for such parties in those childhood days, and she has never outgrown her liking for the word or the occasion either. It is a "party" with us even when we invite only the little old woman who, as Adele says, "taxi-derms" for a living. She lives in the back flat on our floor, and I must tell you about her

"Delicious!" said the editor. "You really four make some copy out of this original Marthy." "You know I told you she was peculiar," said Philippa.

When Marthy came to take away the soup there was a light in her eye, and the corners of her mouth twitched. I could see that her rarely awakened spirit of mischief was alert and I could only hope for the best. If Philippa would only behave! The conversation had got into the channels of literary shop and I knew how unlikely it was that this current should have pauses. But I didn't knew Philippa.

"Marthy," she said. "this gentleman is very much interested in you—"

"He ain't de first!" put in Marthy.

"——and he wants to know if you couldn't tell us some of your negro traditions after dinner," continued Philippa.

"I dunno," said Marthy, with some hesitation, "I dunno at I can el I do."

So it was arranged that Marthy should come in after dinner and tell us her "native traditions," I dunno at I can el I do."

So it was arranged that Marthy should come in after dinner and tell us her "native traditions," and with that Philippa let her alone, while Frances and I trusted to Adele's slipping out of her promise.

But not she had no intention of escaping. She sent Frances in, when we had left the table, with instructions to turn down the lights, and in a few minutes she stole in, looking picturesque enough, with her bright "tignon," and her eyes and her teeth shining in the half darkness, We all settled ourselves with a little thrill of anticipation as Marthy seated herself on the floor and finshed a glance at us which we felt rather than saw. Then she began very low:

"I reckon as how you all's huhd tell o' Brer This time, however, I want to tell you about Philippa's latest party. Last week, you remember. I explained that Philippa was in lit-erature. She hadn't written anything yet, but she had been trying to hunt up material for an article, and she had ideas. One day, when we were having our afternoon tea. Philippa was strangely thoughtful. She was in her usual corner, on the floor beside the window, and-also as usual-she put her empty cup down beside her and pushed it back under the Aivan. Frances has to regularly recover Philippa's cups, else would we soon have none on the table. After Philippa had put her cup under the divan she fell into her favorite atitude for talking, with her hands clasped about her knees, and then we knew something was

"Girls," said Philippa slowly, "let's give a "Oh, Philippa," said Frances, "It's so hot."

"I know, dear. They'll have smaller appetites for that same reason. We ought to give our party in this warm spell, if for no other reason than economy."

"But why should we give one at all." "Dear." said Philippa, in a tone of patient superiority, "if you were in literature you'd

"Well, since I am not in literature, perhaps you woulden't mind telling me," said Frances.
"Not in the least. I was just going to explain anyway. In the first place, you know, I am not so far into literature as I want to be. Now, I am convinced that literature is a good deal like matrimony; it is largely a matter of propinquity. I believe that people marry other people because they are handy. You know what I mean. They know each other and are thrown together and there you are. Now I think it is pretty much the same thing in literature. The editors know loads of bright peothe whole thing up?" said Adele slvly. Adele loves to tense Philippa, and on this occasion she got the usual response; Philippa shied a book at her.

"Birls! girls!" expostulated Frances. "If you'd only break each other's heads, I wouldn't care, but think of the tea table!"

Then we got Philippa started again and she explained that she thought literature was a close corporation of a more or less social nature. A asks B for an article on a certain subject because he wants the article and he happens to know and like B, and C runs across D at a friend's house and says he is going to write such and such a story, whereupon D says: "Send it around and let us have the write such and such a story, whereupon D says: "Send it around and let us have the first look at it."

"Now," says Philippa, "I believe the first step toward being in literature is to be in with literary people."

"Where are your people?" asked Frances, dejectedly.

It was then that Philippa named over her prospective guests; one woman writer, one editor, one journalist, two other writers of a general character, and a lawyer. The lawyer was not strictly literary, but he had literary relatives, so Philippa countenanced him.

"You know we haven't enough plates for two courses?" said Frances after evident calculation.

"We'll have them washed between the acts," was I billippa sounchainer teply.

calculation.
"We'll have them washed between the acts,"
was Philippa's nonchalent reply.
"And what will you do in the mean time?"
"Fil tell them not to be discouraged, that the plates are being washed."
"O', Philippa' have you no pride?" demanded Frances.

Frances: Yes!" said Phillippa. "It's a case of more pride than plates. Now, don't warry, Frances: literary people are all hohemians, and they know we are just picknicking, not marked and they know we are just picknicking, not Frances: literary people are all bohemians, and they know we are just picknicking, not housekeeping."

So the party was decided upon. Frances made out her modest bill of fare, and Philippa wrote notes to her people, who promptly accepted. We have a colored maid who comes in every day and gets or i uncheon and dinner for us, and Marthe that's her name was particularly instructed not to fail us on the day of the great event. That day arrived, Philippa went to her studio and I went out of mportant ballings went to her studio and I went out of mportant ballings which kept me until the latter part of the afternoon. When I came he, the girls were having their tea, and there was evidently trouble in the air.

"Why do you all look so black?" I said as I dropped into a chair and legan to fan myself. "Hack!" greaned Frances. "If one of us only were black!"

"What!" I exclaimed in amazement.

"We are shout to hing a sign on the front door," said Philippa, and she held up a paper on which she had written:

WANTED,

Colored Person! The More Color the Better!

"What do you mean?" I demanded.
"I mean that I rances and I have put in the whole afterneon sharing. 'Ch. Marthy! where at thou? and still no Marthy!"
"No Marthy!" I repeated.
"You eatch my idea, "said Philippa.
"What's to be done?"
Philippa spread out her hands.
"I wouldn't care so much, "she said ruefully. "If I had a told that editor about Marthy. You see, it is a matter of business with me. Just the other day he said:
"Why, Mes Philippa, you must put your Marthy into some sactions for us."
"And now is ill think I made her up," and Philippa shahed despairingly.
"And there won't be a soul to wait on the table," added Frances.
"See here, girls," said Adele, who had been very quiet, "I will settle the matter for you."
"How?" in chorus.
"Yeal! I'll do what I did once before for

"How?" in chorus.
"Well, I'll do what I did once before for some friends who were in the same pickle. I'll do and wait on table, and I can do better than Marthy any way."

isn't impossible, and it isn't nonsense,

"The idea."
"It is not impossible, and it isn't nonsense, and it's a good tien, as you will all admit a little after. It will be a great lark for us, the duner will be served all right, and Philippa's prospects won't be ruined."

Of course we all protested, but when Adelo says she'll do a thing you might as well turn is and help. It will facilitate the inectable. When we had at last rejuctantly yielded we began to feel the spirit of the thing, and we had so much fun getting our make-ledieve Martny ready that we aimost forest to dress ourselves. It was a splendid make-up, and by putting heavy paper chades on every lamp and omitting the gas, we so subdued the light that we were quite sure of Adele's passing the discovered. I will admit that when our new servant came and sanctuneed with considerable pumps sity and a re-mounced darky accent that dismail was served, I had an almost hysterical maxture of fright and laughter, but, although the editor hooked up quickly, it was only with the interest aroused by Philippa's accounts of our maid.

"So that is Marthy?" I heard him say as he and Philippa waiken out ingelher.

Philippa weaken out ingelher.

Philippa towed up at him and emited.

"You would know her at once from my description, would know her at once from my description, wouldn't your seemission to try to draw her out a little during dinner?"

Philippa turned page.

"Anarthy is very possillar," she sain, "especially with strangers. I would advise you to take as little notice of her as possible to high. The next time you come she will feel more acquainted."

"On, very well," said the editor, with a disappointed glance at the supposed Marthy, who stood at one side rolling her eyes in a truly frightful manner.

THE SWAN'S NEST IN THE PARK.

Another Egg Expected To-day, and Then Two More to Complete the Nest. The swan's nest on the shore of the pond in Central Park near West Seventy-fifth street is guarded jealously by the female bird and her consort, who take turns in keeping the solitary "No. Southern."
"With that complexion?"
"Yes; ould, isn't it? Adels came from the same State you did, didn't she, Marthy?" said Philipps, who could not long resist the temptation to play with fire.
"Yess'm," murmured Marthy, the make-beegg warm. Timothy Dennech, who has taken care of the swans in the Park for more than care of the swans in the Park for more than thirty-seven years, said yesterday that there is another egg due to-day. When the number grows to four the nest will be complete, and the young birds will be hatched out in six weeks. Mr. Denneen has raised about one hundred young swans. He says the matted swans brood regularly every year. One year eighteen of the young birds were hatched out, but only a few of them lived. Last year there were five, of which a solitary bird survives. The pond is ill an apted to the raising of the young because there is no enclosed space. Mischievous boys row boats about the pond and often a swan's back is broken by a blow from an oar. Mon to play with fire.

"cans"m," murnured Marthy, the make-believe.

"If it hadn't been for Adele," pursued Philppa, "we wouldn't have had Marthy. Isn't that so, Marthy?

"Yaas-m," with some show of resentment at being appealed to. Then with a sudden flash of her eyes: "Miss Adele's wuth de whole lot o' you all!" and Marthy disappeared
suddenly in the kitchen.

We three girls burst into laughter as we realized our helplessness to defend ourselves
under the circumstances,

"She does not include you in that," said
Frances, reaswiringly. "She bears us a grudge because we are enjoying your society, while Adele is deprived of it. She is so loyal to Adele!" and we laughed again.

"Delicious" said the editor, "You really must make some copy out of this original Marthy."

"You know I told you slie was peculiar."

Charles Mason diagnosed the case as appendicitis. In: Erdman of Bellevue Hospital has just performed an operation. He found that the appendix vermiformis was ulcerated, and that it had broken open. He removed it.

A small piece of chewing gum was found in it. About the gum had adhered particles of half diagsted foud. Altogether the mass was mout the size of a walnut. Owing to a high state of inflammation existing, it is feared Haggerty will die.
